SUP-SUPPORT	Impressive—our D-cup tester could run in it, no problem.	Combo of polyester-spandex material and hook-and-eye closures in back hold up well for low- and medium-impact activities like Pilates and cycling.	Above average, thanks to the superclose fit and 11 hook-and-eyes in front.	Despite having adjustable straps, it only stops jiggle for low-impact activities like yoga and strength training.	With help from an underwire and wide adjustable straps, this bra handles anything up to medium-impact like a Spinning or ballet class.	Thanks in part to the adjustable straps, it works for medium-impact activities like power-walking and inline skating.
COM-FORT	Keeps you cool and wicks sweat well; ample, adjustable straps and band, and nylon-polyester material make for a great fit. It's so comfy that a few testers forgot they were even wearing it.	Wicks sweat nicely and breathes well. Testers loved the easily adjustable (Velcro in front) wide straps but complained about the straps' uncomfortable seams.	Extreme compression and dense polyester-spandex material combine for poor sweat-wicking and next to no breathability. Plus, the superwide straps aren't adjustable.	Very breathable and wicks impressively; also has a super-comfortable elastic band beneath breasts.	As comfortable as your everyday bra but with more wicking power—mesh weave on the back acts like an air conditioner while you sweat.	Easy to get on, but straps are cut too close to the neck and there is some gapping on sides and back (the band's not adjustable); wicks well. One catch: Our tester said it made her feel a little warm.
LOOKS	Beware the uniboob. Plus, the no-frills style definitely isn't couture.	Bland, basic styling; no breast separation.	Ugh. Fabric nearly up to your collarbone and shininess that recalls an 80s prom gown.	Testers' favorite bra, stylewise, thanks to the racer back and cool colors.	Pretty basic. Our testers loved the way encapsulated cups lift and separate for a great look under a workout top.	Nice zip-in-front style, but otherwise plain.
